as the rates of chronic diseases like diabetes asthma and obesity skyrocket research is showing that the built environment the way our cities and towns are developed contributes to the epidemic rates of these diseases it is unlikely that those who planned and developed these places envisioned these situations public health community development planning and other fields influencing the built environment have operated in isolation for much of recent history with the result being places that public health advocates have labelled designed for disease the sad irony of this is that planning and public health arose together in response to the need to create health standards zoning and building codes to combat the infectious diseases that were prevalent in the industrializing cities of late nineteenth and early twentieth century america in recent years the dramatic rise in chronic disease rates in cities and towns has begun to bring public health and planning back together to promote development pattern and policies facilitating physical activity and neighbourly interactions as antidotes in this book a number of such community development efforts are highlighted bringing attention to the need to coordinate planning community development and health policy this book was originally published as a special issue of community development the supplemental nutrition assistance program snap formerly known as food stamps is one of the most controversial forms of social welfare in the united states although it s commonly believed that such federal programs have been cut back since the 1980s maggie dickinson charts the dramatic expansion and reformulation of the food safety net in the twenty first century today receiving snap benefits is often tied to work requirements which essentially subsidizes low wage jobs excluded populations such as the unemployed informally employed workers and undocumented immigrants must rely on charity to survive feeding the crisis tells the story of eight families as they navigate the terrain of an expanding network of assistance programs in which care and abandonment work hand in hand to make access to food uncertain for people on the social and economic margins amid calls at the federal level to expand work requirements for food assistance dickinson shows us how such ideas are bad policy that fail to adequately address hunger in america feeding the crisis brings the voices of food insecure families into national debates about welfare policy offering fresh insights into how we can establish a right to food in the united states the amount of snap benefits per meal in new york city was reduced from the paltry level of 1 70 per meal in august 2013 to an even smaller 1 60 per meal in august 2014 partially because the benefits were less adequate few new yorkers applied or re applied for snap the rolls declined by 125 487 people in the city during that year as a result of both the reduction in average benefit amount and the drop in the overall caseload low income new york city residents will receive an estimated 426 million less in federal snap funding in 2014 than in 2013 council of senior centers and services cscs in collaboration with the national council on aging has developed this mapping and data base of where under enrollment of the snap program food stamps is among new york city elders cscs undertook this project to tell the story about elders without enough money for food and create a road map of where to target food stamps outreach and enrollment this data is broken down by community district lines using 2011 american community census data the most up to date available information this is the first time data in this form has been developed and made available hunger and food insecurity are serious problems in new york city approximately 1 3 million new yorkers rely on emergency food programs such as soup kitchens and food pantries limited access to food and in particular limited access to nutritious food affect the development of health conditions ranging from stunting and poor brain development in children to chronic diseases like diabetes and heart disease in adults there is also a growing body of evidence that food insecurity can lead to obesity because the least expensive food available is typically high in calories and high in fat but low in nutrients the food stamp program fsp the us s largest food assistance program is an opportunity to relieve hunger and its health effects as well as obesity and its health effects in low income communities this paper explains how the fsp functions in new york city and new york state and identifies areas of opportunity for maximizing good nutrition and healthy weight for low income new yorkers the first set of opportunities address factors within the program that pose barriers to maximizing enrollment among eligible individuals the second set concern the program's intersection with food retailers and the availability and affordability of healthy foods in low income neighborhoods this policy brief suggests possible approaches to these two sets of issues to develop this paper the new york academy of medicine reviewed publicly available documents spoke with public officials and contacted a number of nonprofit organizations
