journey home is a set of essays about living and dying with an open heart while many of us fear death and dying these essays argue that embracing life and death can help us reclaim a richness we're denied in a death phobic culture what's more opening our hearts can help us celebrate the preciousness of life and craft a life affirming legacy for our families and loved ones some of the issues investigated include death as a stranger death and dying have become institutionalized and medicalized to the extent that few outside the medical or funeral industries have witnessed or cared for a dying or dead person this removal of death and dying from our lives is eroding our affinity and kinship to events that have been seminal to culture since the dawn of humanity this conspiracy among us is shrinking our capacities to be fully human to make a meaning from death and to die well death phobia a living culture provides an affirmative meaning for death through its myths and rituals but today in the west death is feared because it means annihilation death is a kind of desolation and without a mythological or cultural story to feed us we fear it like never before as a result death phobia lies at the heart of our institutions and endeavours this is apparent in the training of our health professionals and the services rendered by healthcare the costs of living longer if we can we should have become a mantra in modern medicine faced with a choice between death long term chronic ill health and the prospect of a cure few can resist choosing more treatment but the experience of many people who choose new drugs and aggressive medical interventions isn't what they imagined evidence shows that terminally ill people who choose more interventions endure more illness and complications and experience less autonomy than those who choose palliative and hospice care by contrast people who accept their prognosis and who choose palliative care are happier and live longer than those who endlessly pursue life extending therapies end of life conversations stories about families burdened by making life and death decisions for their loved ones are too common so are stories of doctors taking matters into their own hands sometimes against the wishes of patients and families evidence shows that people who have practical conversations with doctors and their families about their preferences for their end of life care are more likely to die a good death while sparing their families a lot of heartache and distress rituals of the body what becomes of our body when we die needn't preoccupy us but we can ease the burden on loved ones by letting them know what to do with our corpse this matters because they live with the memory of our body and although we can't ensure that our wishes for our body are honoured recording them and sharing them is an act of love a way to care for the living living our deepest truth each of us is called to particular work according to our biography and talents and circumstances but remembering the particular work we are born for is a hard business today it's given little comfort or tuition but answering that call and making it happen in the world is to lay claim to our deepest truth and our kinship to each other elders once upon a time we had elders people whose words and deeds revealed the wisdom of living and dying in accord with the time tested truth that life has limits they are living testaments of the truth that life will continue even though we won't and that our lives are nourished and sustained by a covenant of reciprocity for those who can hear young people's longing for wisdom it is a petition to step away from cosy retreat and into servant leadership

why have certain kinds of documentary and non narrative films emerged as the most interesting exciting and provocative movies made in the last twenty years ranging from the films of ross mcelwee bright leaves and agnès varda the gleaners and i to those of abbas kiarostami close up and ari folman waltz with bashir such films have intrigued viewers who at the same time have struggled to categorize them sometimes described as personal documentaries or diary films these eclectic works are rather best understood as cinematic variations on the essay so argues tim corrigan in this stimulating and necessary new book since michel de montaigne essays have been seen as a lively literary category and yet despite the work of pioneers like chris marker seldom discussed as a cinematic tradition the essay film offering a thoughtful account of the long rapport between literature and film as well as novel interpretations and theoretical models provides the ideas that will change this
