could perceived relative economic standing affect citizens support for political leaders and institutions we explore this question by examining pakistan s national unconditional cash transfer program the benazir income support program bisp leveraging a regression discontinuity approach using bisp s administrative data and an original survey experiment we find that perceptions of relative deprivation color citizen reactions to social protection when citizens do not feel relatively deprived receiving cash transfers has little sustained effect on individuals reported level of support for their political system and its leaders however when citizens feel relatively worse off those receiving cash transfers become more politically satisfied while those denied transfers become more politically disgruntled moreover the magnitude of the reduction in political support among non beneficiaries is larger than the magnitude of the increase in political support among beneficiaries this has important implications for our understanding of the political ramifications of rising perceived inequality
