michael b gill offers an original account of humean moral pluralism moral pluralism is the view that there are different ultimate moral reasons for action that those different reasons can sometimes come into conflict with each other and that there exist no invariable ordering principles that tell us how to resolve such conflicts if moral pluralism is true we will at times have to act on moral decisions for which we can give no fully principled justification humeanism is the view that our moral judgments are based on our sentiments that reason alone could not have given rise to our moral judgments and that there are no mind independent moral properties for our moral judgments to track in this book gill shows that the combination of these two views produces a more accurate account of our moral experiences than the monistic rationalist and non naturalist alternatives he elucidates the historical origins of the humean pluralist position in the works of david hume adam smith and their eighteenth century contemporaries and explains how recent work in moral psychology has advanced this position and he argues for the position's superiority to the non naturalist pluralism of w d ross and the monism of kantianism and consequentialism the pluralist account of the content of morality has been traditionally perceived as belonging with non naturalist intuitionism the humean sentimentalist account of morality has been traditionally perceived as not belonging with any view of morality's content at all humean moral pluralism explodes both those perceptions it shows that pluralism and humeanism belong together and that they make a philosophically powerful couple
